The following is an edited extract from a newspaper article entitled 'Smash those Senate blockages and let policy flow free' written by Peter Van Onselen and published in The Weekend Australian, December 19-20, 2015.

The theory of the Senate has long been that it acts as a check on government ... But the notion of a second chamber in our bicameral system operating as a check and balance only works if government mandates are recognised. The problem is establishing exactly what constitutes a mandate.

Understandably, minor parties that take policies to elections that differ from those being argued for by the party that wins government in the House of Representatives feel they have secured a mandate with the Senate numbers they secure to hold the line on what they argued for (or against) at the election. If the Opposition joins in ... the likelihood is that the election-winning policies won't get through both parliamentary chambers.

Is that appropriate? Most voters would surely say no.

Never forget the only reason we are being forced to revisit the GST* debate is because the Australian Democrats wound back John Howard's GST from the version he took to the 1998 election ... But at least the Democrats were willing to negotiate. The Greens with Labor and a scattering of Independents aren't likely even to do that.

The composition of the Senate, and the inflated views of senators have about their own mandates, is the problem.

The following is an edited extract from an online article published in The Conversation entitled: 'Following suit: why political conventions matter', written by Richard Mulgan, Emeritus Professor, Australian National University (December 9, 2015).

All political systems make extensive use of conventions ... Conventions are accepted practices that don't have the authority of law but depend instead on the force of shared values and expectations. They are more fluid than legal rules and tend to evolve over time.

Though the Australian Commonwealth has a formal constitution ... it still follows Westminster in allowing key principles of democratic accountability to operate according to convention.

Conventions of ministerial responsibility underpin the daily accountability of ministers to parliament and the public. ... Ministerial responsibility has been used to protect anonymity* of public servants, on the ground that only ministers should answer for their departments and agencies. Ministers are expected to take the blame for actions for which they are personally responsible, but not for those that are clearly the fault of officials.

Relations between ministers and the public service are also subject to shifting conventions. Westminster-based traditions support a politically neutral public service appointed on merit ... But since the early 1990s, heads of departments (secretaries) who are appointed by the prime minister, have been employed on limited-term contracts terminable at any time. In 1996 incoming prime minister, John Howard, broke the convention that incumbent* secretaries would serve out their terms under a new government, by immediately replacing six secretaries.
