Question 1

Explain how the writer’s voice in Text 1 is constructed through language features.
Text 2

Text 2 is an extract from the 2010 novel Wavelength, by Western Australian author, A J Betts. Its protagonist is a Year 12 student named Oliver.

He’s drawn to the blue light beaming down over the pool, and he’s not the only one. There are dozens of insects softly smacking at the floodlight that shines like a beacon. He wonders if they confuse it with the moon. At least they leave him alone as he sits at the base of the light pole. In front of him the fifty-metre pool stretches out like iridescent silk. The surface is unruffled and tight, as if you could peel it back like a layer of skin.

Oliver runs his hands through the water again and it’s not cold at all. Ripples arc out, sliding all the way to the shallow end. He relocates himself and the books to the edge so he can submerge his feet and calves. The water feels warm and thick and it relaxes his legs and everything else in him. He notices the subtle reflection of stars.

The lane is long and straight in front of him, longer than he remembers, when three mornings a week were dedicated to trawling lanes like these: 400m warm-ups, 400m kicking, 8x50m sprints, 600m medley and 400m cool down, all before school. Back then a lap could take forty seconds, or thirty-eight if he tried really hard.

Oliver recalls his arms spearing the surface, the frenzy of bubbles and gasping for air at the end. A lap wasn’t very long, back then, not like it looks now.

Is it nostalgia that coaxes him to his feet? Standing on the platform just before a race was the most exhilarating part. He would fold himself over, his webbed toes spread across the edge of the platform. In those seconds before the starter’s gun, nothing else in the world mattered. His head would throb with his pulse; his guts would drop to his chest. He dared not breathe, his body waiting for the signal followed by the frightening burst of power and speed and everything. It was terrifying. And addictive. He often wondered what he might have achieved – how far he could have gotten – if his dad had never left and he had kept on swimming.
Question 2
(10 marks)

Compare how a similar idea about swimming is treated in Text 1 and Text 2.
Text 3

Text 3 is an advertisement created for a law firm, Webber Wentzel Attorneys. It was published in 2011.
